THE TIMES MAGAZINE FOCUS AND COMMENT

Credit control the Government them

David Blair

Will 1962 be the year when the Government brings back credit control? The idea is creeping out of line with the changes made in the running of monetary policy in recent years.

But its plausibility increased by two powerful facts.

The first is the Government is faced with increasing conflict between its hopes of economic recovery and its control of credit.

The second is the need to get out of the obvious solution of increasing the use of interest rate.

It is a price of resources, which may be needed.

On the other hand, the Government is faced with the need to control credit.

no we there any anecdotal counts of building bills to justify mortgage

There are, equally obvious reasons why these are policies of intervention by the Government to decide on the categories of lending to be favoured.
